“It is not by forgetting where we come from that we become who we are.[1]”

I can't deny my roots. I will always be Ludivine Oyono, born in Yaoundé, Cameroon, from the Mefou-akono region. My life has been far from simple... Getting rid of the burdens, the gangrene that strangles one's life, requires supernatural strength. Understanding and accepting the problem, in order to finally overcome it, is a long-term struggle….

-October 1, 1988-

A woman is screaming. Her contractions are causing her pain. We are in Nkoldongo, Yaoundé, Cameroon. She is already the mother of five children; this is her sixth child on the way….

Two hours later, she gave birth in great pain. She later told her other children that she thought she would die during the birth. Ludivine, throughout her childhood, was singled out by her brothers and sisters: « You were the one who wanted to kill Mom when you came into the world».

-December 1, 1988-

The baby is already two months old; his star shines brightly. It's nightfall. Ludivine's parents have brought the baby to the banks of a river: -Luc, Ludivine's father, is holding in a raffia bag: a small crocodile, a coffin, a chain, and lots of other small animals and various objects.: « It's been two months now that I haven't been able to take her star that shines so brightly. I'm still her father; it's to me that this luxuriant life must return. If I can't snatch all her life, then she must suffer».

- Isabelle, Ludivine's mother:
« You are the head of the family, you decide, give me your decision and we will act as you wish ».
